Lena is someone who always came to the defense of kids who were bullied. She soon realized, however, that defensive actions don’t solve this problem. She would have to do something pro-active to combat bullying. With the help of her school’s art club, Lena designed and assembled a movable, three-dimensional mural that would serve as an interactive anti-bullying display. The mural is shaped as a tree. There are two changeable questions about bullying at the top, and paper tubes that form the trunk and branches where anonymous replies can be placed. Lena’s project not only encourages students to speak honestly about this issue, it also gives school administrators a way to evaluate the effectiveness of their bullying and diversity programs.