Jane was inspired to work with incarcerated youth after a childhood friend landed in juvenile detention. She decided to become involved with the Delaware Youth Rehabilitative Services (DYRS), believing that decisions made as a teen should not set one on a downward trajectory for life. First, Jane started a book club for youths associated with DYRS. She then hosted a clothing drive to collect clothes that would be appropriate for job interviews, and organized a Christmas stocking project so that each young person had gifts at the holidays. Most significant were her efforts to discourage repeat offenses. She created what she called a “Re-Entry Fund,” which raised money for transportation and various positive activities that would help the incarcerated young people reacclimate to everyday life. The State of Delaware legislature heard about Jane’s efforts and actually made the “Re-entry Fund” part of their budget!
