Morgan got her start in nutritional education when she served as a Co-President of HYPE, (Healthy You. Positive Energy.) This student-led organization works to ensure a healthier environment for all. One of its notable accomplishments under Morgan’s leadership was to secure healthy snacks for the school’s vending machines. Morgan then acquired an internship at a nonprofit organization called Food Trust, where she learned that the lack of nutritious foods and beverages in urban neighborhoods makes chronic illnesses more prevalent in those communities. She began working with other non-profits and City Council to launch a campaign about the perils of living on nutrient-void foods. Morgan also discovered that there is a lack of palatable water in Philadelphia schools. She persuaded the School District to install hydration stations in all 214 of its schools!
